

Pinpointing a Minor Defect

One October day in 2016, the respected Comrade Kim Jong Un visited the Mangyongdae Revolutionary Site Souvenir Factory, which was making notable progress in building up its foundations for increased production after the completion of the renovation project.

At the zipper teeth workshop, he looked at a tab and a slide through a magnifying glass.

After a while, he said: Some parts of the slide are not coloured well; if such slides are fixed to a bag, it will be a sub-standard product.

After completing the zipper production line in a unique way, many visiting officials were happy to see the products, but none of them paid close concern to ensuring perfect product quality.

Comrade Kim Jong Un's meticulous attention to such a trifling defect mirrored his ennobling view of the people.

He underlined the need to improve the technique for colouring slides, adding that the zipper slides for high-grade bags should be plated in golden or silver colour.

Then he gave advice on how to diversify the shapes and colours of the products.

The officials realized that, true to his ennobling intentions, they should do everything perfect for the good of the people.
